Brett Butler looks to get back to racing

Brett Butler has seen his fair share of ups and downs in 2010. After a career high 11th at Daytona, Butler is coming off a troublesome week at Nashville that left the rookie, scratching and clawing at his eyes and skin after a lap one incident resulted in fiberglass fragments covering nearly every inch of his body.

“That was a tough weekend for sure but I am fully recovered and ready to get back at it in Kansas,” stated Brett.

Butler will be racing the Fuel Doctor USA colors once again on his #47 Chevy and is looking forward to getting behind the wheel once again.

“It seems like it has been forever since we raced, but that’s just how our schedule falls. I just want to get back in the Fuel Doctor truck and race again,” Brett claimed.

Butler has been busy over the past few weeks, not only recovering from his incident in Nashville but also with his new company, Alpha Dog Training.

“The company is going really well. My brother KBIII, and myself had the pleasure of hosting the SPEED Channel crew last week at the training center as they taped a segment to air this week during the NASCAR weekend,” stated Brett.

“It is really great to have an organization like NASCAR, SPEED, and the Camping World get behind the competitors and show their real life. It allows fans to see what we do in the little spare time that we do have and bring that to light.”

Coverage of the O’Reilly Auto Parts 250 at Kansas Speedway will begin on Saturday, May 1st with practice at 10:00am CST and qualifying at 3:35pm CST with race coverage starting at 12:00 noon CST on Sunday May 2nd.
